

BUILD SOMETHING SMALLER

Not every problem requires a large organization.
Sometimes change begins with five people around a table.
See a need? Build a group around it.
Concerned about antisemitism in schools? Organize parents.
Want more Jewish cultural programming? Create it.
Want stronger relationships with local officials? Bring people together.
Want more Jewish presence in public spaces? Make it happen.
The strongest movements are often built from dozens of smaller efforts working toward a common goal.
Don't wait for permission.
Start where you are.

PROXIMITY CHANGES MINDS

People rarely change their views because they lost an argument online.
They change because of relationships.
Neighbors care about neighbors.
Parents listen to other parents.
Communities support people they know.
When Jews participate in civic life, volunteer in public spaces, host community events, celebrate our culture openly, and build relationships with those around us, we create understanding that no social media campaign can replicate.
Parks, libraries, festivals, farmers markets, and community events are not just public spaces.
They are opportunities.
Opportunities to share our story.
Opportunities to build alliances.
Opportunities to strengthen our place within the communities we call home.

OUR TURN

The future of Jewish life will not be built by someone else.
It will be built by Jews willing to show up, speak up, and get involved.

WHY ACTIVISM MATTERS

Many Jews spend hours discussing problems online.

We debate. We share articles. We argue in comment sections. We vent to people who already agree with us.

Meanwhile, decisions are being made in school board meetings, city halls, libraries, neighborhood associations, and community organizations—often without Jewish voices in the room.

The future of our community will not be determined by who wins an argument on Facebook.

It will be determined by who shows up. Real influence comes from participation. Real change comes from relationships. Real leadership comes from engagement.

If we want a stronger Jewish future, we must stop shouting into the abyss and start building influence where we live.

GET INVOLVED IN LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Most of the decisions that shape daily life happen close to home. School boards. City councils. Planning commissions. Parks departments. Library boards.

These institutions decide how public resources are used, what programs are funded, and what kind of community we create together.

You do not need to run for office. Attend meetings. Introduce yourself.

Speak during public comment. Join advisory boards. Build relationships with elected officials before a crisis occurs.

When engaged citizens participate consistently, they stop being spectators and become stakeholders.

GET INVOLVED IN YOUR SCHOOLS

Schools are where future generations form their understanding of the world.

If Jewish parents and community members are absent, others will shape those conversations for us.

Join PTOs.
Volunteer.

Build relationships with teachers and administrators.

Attend school board meetings. Advocate respectfully and consistently.

The goal is not confrontation.
The goal is presence.

People are far more likely to understand and support a community they actually know.
